HEALTH WARNING: - applicable to all inland water activities at any venue.

A. Weil's Disease is a bacterial infection carried in rats' urine which contaminates water and wet river banks. The bacteria does not survive for long in dry conditions. It can be a serious illness requiring hospital treatment, and can lead to kidney or liver failure. Weil's disease is a modifiable illness. The bacteria are absorbed through the skin or mucous membranes of the mouth and eyes. It gets into the blood stream very easily if you have a minor cut on your skin or feet, should you become immersed. If you feel ill after training or have any of the following symptoms, call your doctor promptly. The most common early symptoms are high temperature, an influenza-type illness and muscle pains. Tell your doctor that you have been undertaking water activities and where and ask if you can have a blood test for Weil's disease. Weil's disease can be caught in any wetted area where rats are present including garden ponds and public park areas

B. Certain species of the blue-green algae can produce toxins which, upon contact, may cause a number of conditions such as dermatitis, asthma, eye irritation, rashes, blistering of the skin around the mouth and nose, nausea, gastroenteritis, muscle cramps, headaches and pneumonia in some people. The lake water quality is tested regularly by Wessex Water including testing for Blue Green Algae
